Even though my trampoline is in the shade, the heatwave makes it too hot for bouncing. I bounce anyway because when you have no friends in the summer holidays there's nothing else to do.

'Hello!'

It's a girl's voice. It comes with a body and a grinning face that bobs up and down behind the third fence panel along. The new neighbours must have a trampoline exactly in line with ours. It feels like an invasion.

'I'm Richa,' says the girl and waves when she's at her highest. Her hair is black and long. It stays in the air after she falls, like an exclamation mark above her head.

The urge to run and hide is strong, but I force myself to keep bouncing.

My dog, Patch, gets up and sticks his nose under the fence. His tail wags really fast and he makes a 'hello' whine.

Richa notices him when she's up above the fence. She points and says, 'You've got a dog! I love dogs, but my stupid brother Aahan is allergic. He's a totally useless three year old who cries and moans and carries on and on about nothing.' Richa's voice is hot and puffy. It goes quiet and loud depending on where she is in the air. She sounds like she's from somewhere different. Not Luton. 'I'm ten,' she goes on. 'How old are you? What's your dog called?'

She's good at bouncing. She's good at talking. She has long, thin arms that waggle about streaked with sun cream, and bare feet. Like everyone she wears shorts and a vest top. Because of the heatwave all clothes make you boiling hot. The only shoes people wear are flip-flops or sandals.

One of the back windows of Richa's house opens wider. A woman, who is probably Richa's mum, leans out and speaks a whole load of words in another language.

There are lots of kids from all over the world at my school. My guess is that Richa's mum is speaking in Gujarati, because she speaks just like Rama in Chestnut Class and his family are from Gujarat in India.

If I could talk, it might be a question I would ask Richa, but I will never ask a question to a stranger. It's hard enough just to keep bouncing and not run away, and I can only look at Richa when she isn't looking at me.

Richa shouts back in one big rush. She says three words in English: 'roasting', 'bouncing' and 'dog'. Their conversation carries on, sounding crosser all the time until Richa stops it by saying, 'na, na' and bouncing around so that her back is turned to the window.

'She wants to slam the window shut to show she's angry with me,' Richa explains, 'but it's way too boiling hot for closed windows. She'll shut the curtains all huffy instead.'

Boiling and roasting are words that everyone uses. We know the heatwave is cooking us all, like sausages.

‘Mum says it’s hotter than India,’ Richa says, still bouncing. ‘She’s grumpy because we’ve had to move house and she’s really, really, really pregnant. I hope it’s a girl.’ She looks me up and down between bounces and adds, ‘No offence. Not all boys are bad, but I do-not-want-another-brother!’ Richa says the last bit up into the sky with her hands in prayer.

She bounces a bit more, watching me, then says, ‘Do you have any brothers or sisters? You don’t say much. Don’t you talk? Why don’t you talk?’

It’s amazing to me that Richa can say all these words. If I was a boy that could speak, these would be my answers to her questions:

1. My name is Leo, but the people I can talk to call me Lion. I can count all of their names on one hand.
2. I’m ten too. Just had my birthday party with my family. It was OK, and nothing like Theo’s party at RollerCentral where I froze like a statue and everybody stared at me. That was the worst time of my entire life.

3. My dog is called Patch because he is brown and white but has a big black patch over his right eye and ear. It makes him look like a dog-pirate. I can talk to Patch. He is my only one true friend. What I would like more than anything in the whole world is a real friend, but you can't be friends with someone who can't talk – fact.
4. I have a big brother called Ryan who is seventeen and sprays stuff all over his body that makes the back of my throat go dry. Brianne is my sister; she is sixteen and wears floaty skirts and scarves and wants to be a physicist. Brianne and Ryan argue all the time.
5. No, I don't say much. I want to talk but I can't.
